

2026 US Open Ticket Options and Average Prices: How to Spot a Good Deal

Day-by-day options, sample schedules, and average prices to expect — from Fan Week through the finals.

Navigating US Open ticket options and prices can be overwhelming. I built this chart to help fellow fans see every ticket option at a glance, understand the overall scheduling context, and benchmark prices against real data from this year and last — so you can spot reasonable deals and make decisions with more confidence. See my full post, “A Serious Tennis Fan’s Complete Guide to the 2026 US Open” for much more.

How to read this chart

- The price ranges are rough indicators, based on average prices right after 2026 tickets went on sale in late May — think of them as a baseline to measure against. The low number is around the cheapest you’ll find for that ticket type; the high number is what one of the best seats in that section was going for around then — and the very best can command hundreds or thousands of dollars more. If you’re seeing higher prices than these, it means they’ve climbed since the on-sale.
- The grey “2025” figure in parentheses is the range on the actual day of those matches last year, with an arrow showing whether the price on match day was higher or lower than it had been a month before: ▲ rose · ▼ fell · ● flat. Treat it as context, not a prediction of what this year will do. (These begin with the main draw — Fan Week above shows free grounds and the few ticketed Ashe sessions.)
- Every option includes direct shortcut links to the right Ticketmaster and StubHub page. (These are affiliate links: you pay no more, and the small commission supports the blog and my volunteer work — thank you!)

For example, an entry like this:

Promenade $280–475+ (2025: $300–315 ▲)

$280–475+ is this year’s range — the “+” means the very best seats go higher. (2025: $300–315 ▲) is last year’s day-of range, in grey parentheses, with the arrow showing whether the price ended up higher or lower than it had been a month before.

FAN WEEK (August 23–29): FREE Grounds Admission

The big draw is the free Qualifying Tournament (Aug 24–27): 128 men and women competing for the final 32 main tournament singles spots — plus a chance to see top-ranked players practice. Only 4 sessions are ticketed (in Ashe): the Mixed Doubles championship rounds; the Roger Federer exhibition match; and the “Stars of the Open” exhibition. Opening gate times vary — details below.

Normally the night Men's Semifinal session commands higher prices than the day. But in 2025 they shocked everyone by scheduling the blockbuster Djokovic–Alcaraz match in the day session (and put Sinner v. Auger-Aliassime at night) — so day prices spiked and night prices fell. Neither 2025 figure reflects a typical year. 		Grounds pass tickets aren't on sale yet — they may be released later in the summer.
